Citing data from German media group ZDF, the document said that the illegal content on Google represented about three-quarters of the total illicit content posted on the company's platform in the country. The report found that between January and March of this year, illegal content was found on Google's platforms, with the most popular illegal activity including people selling drugs, firearms and stolen goods. ZDF estimated the total amount of illegal content on Google had more than quadrupled since 2016. The report called on the government to pursue strict regulations on the digital advertising market, arguing that Google and Facebook were "no longer in a position to regulate themselves." The German parliament is now considering a variety of measures to crack down on digital platforms, including changing the laws on the protection of data. In January, German news outlet Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung claimed that the number of posts containing "unlawful content" on Facebook in Germany had increased by nearly 50 percent in 2018 compared to 2017. The paper also found that a growing number of users reported their Facebook accounts as being "hacked." According to the ZDF report, Google's revenues from illegal content increased by 1.4 billion euros ($1.5 billion) last year alone. With the social media platform seemingly incapable of regulating its platform effectively, the report called for new methods 81e310abbf
